

Harper to axe party subsidies

Federal Conservatives to follow through on pledge to phase out vote-based funding in June 6 budget

BRUCE CAMPION-SMITH

OTTAWA—Scrapping public subsi-dies for federal political parties will be a key plank in the Conservatives' revised budget, which will be unveiled June 6 on Parliament Hill, the Star has learned.

Stephen Harper's new government, elected earlier this month, intends to move fast on its election vow to end the $2-a-vote annual subsidy, which pumps $27 million a year into various party coffers.

The Conservatives have long opposed the subsidy, and armed now with a majority mandate they have the political weight to finally ase it. However, sources say Harper will also make good on his campaign pledge to phase in the cut gradually, giving political parties three years to wean themselves off the subsidy. In their election platform, the Tories proposed cutting the subsidy first to $1.50, then $1 and then 50 cents before ending it altogether. "Political parties need to take some responsibility in raising their rown money," Harper said during the recent campaign.

While the move sits well with the Conservatives, who excel at grass-roots fundraising, the elimination of the subsidy could put the exis-tence of the Bloc Québécois and Green Party at risk and create seri-ous financial problems for the di-minished Liberals.

TARIME, TANZANIA—It was on the side of a dirt road in northern Tanzania that relatives found a coffin containing the body of Emmanuel Magige on Tuesday morning.

The 27-year-old man was one of seven people killed and more than 22 injured on May 16 when villagers at African Barrick's mine in north-ern Tanzania clashed with security forces. Late Monday night, police stormed a mortuary in the small northern town of Tarime and removed bodies belonging to four of the dead in a bid to prevent a memorial planned at the mine for Tuesday, witnesses said.

After finding the bodies of the victims forcibly returned to their villages, families instead held small burial services at their homes in the afternoon.

"It was inhuman. They did this like animals," said Magige's 20-year-old wife, Mary. African Barrick is a subsidiary of Barrick Gold Corp., which is head-quartered in Toronto. African Barrick said on Tuesday that it had no knowledge of the in-cident.

Pride Toronto will likely get city money after all.

The festival avoided the biggest threat to its future Tuesday when Councillor Giorgio Mammoliti abandoned a plan to make its funding contingent on banning the controversial activist group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA).

The group promised in April not to participate in this year's festivities. But Mammoliti called the pledge insufficient and demanded a letter from Pride guaranteeing QuAIA would be barred. Pride leaders refused, setting up a showdown they said could result in the loss of their licence to hold the 2014 World Pride festival, as well as bankruptcy.

Mammolitie, But he chose not to do so at a heated meeting Tuesday, pronouncing himself satisfied with Pride co-chair Francisco Alvarez's verbal commitment to evict QuAIA members if they show up at festival continued on AIA

The magic of the girl with the carrot-red hair apparently led the Duchess of Cambridge to make sure Prince Edward Island was one of the stops on her first trip to Canada this summer.
